How to use polymorphism to interface with C object I am trying to interface with a C object in C#. I cannot provide the C++ native interface for it, as its header files only contain a prototype and don't provide the prototype to the client in any way. To do this I am using a third party I/O library. The C++ header file provides a set of functions which declare a number of structures that the library makes use of. There is some complete code available on the library website, but all it shows is declaration of the structures and prototypes for the library functions. I think I can safely assume that my client is going to use the library implementation of these functions. I'm having difficulty implementing the call function that will retrieve the data and send it back to the C++ application. I can't think of an easy way to get the managed object from my class to the C++ native object. Is this possible? How would one go about doing this? Any guidance would be greatly appreciated. If anyone is wondering why, I am trying to go from C# to C++ where the native call is made to read data from a COM object in the DLL, so I need to use a different class to get at the data to send back, rather than simply making it accessible. The C++ code is available at: A: Make the C++ class implement an interface that has the same (or better) contract as the C# interface. One set of functions does not know what the other can do, so they can't be too similar. Use the C++'s dynamic cast to do an exact match check (i.e. Cast()) to see if the data comes from the data-structure that is expected. // Copyright 2017 The Go Authors.
